THIS book is affectionately dedicated to my wife, a great-granddaughter of George Mason, who was an intimate friend and associate of General Hugh Mercer.

INTRODUCTION

AN INTRODUCTION is only necessary to this Life of Mercer in order to return thanks to others for what I have herein obtained from them, as well as to disclaim any very marked originality for some things herein written. For instance, I could not and do not claim any great originality for the brief description of the battles of Culloden or of Princeton. Both have been described so often and by so many writers, that there is "nothing new under the sun" to be said about them. I only introduce them here that I may give a full and complete history of the life of Mercer; without them I could not have done so. I return thanks and acknowledge myself under obligations to James D. Law, Esq., of Germantown, Pa.; Rev. J. Lindsay Patton, Ashland, Va.; Judge Beverly R. Wellford, Richmond, Va., and Corbin W. Mercer, Esq., Richmond, Va., for some things that I have embodied in this small volume, and which appear with quotation marks.

I was constrained to write of General Hugh Mercer because I thought that such a life as he lived, and such a death as he died, should be written about; and should be written about by some one who is identified with Fredericksburg, the home of Mercer. How perfectly or imperfectly I have performed the task which I have voluntarily undertaken, I submit to the charitable criticism of my readers.

Respectfully,

JOHN T. GOOLRICK.

CHAPTER I

THE Highlands of Scotland, land of brown heath and shaggy wood—"land of the mountain and the flood"—has always been celebrated in song and story. Its stern and wild mountains, its dark and silent glens, its deep-lying lochs beneath the shadow of the hills, its silent, whirling mists and sudden storms, are the scenes of strange romance and ghastly tragedy. It is a very playground for the novelist's excited imagination and the poet's wildest fancy. But withal, so barren in soil and harsh in climate, that the inhabitants of the Highlands early gave themselves up to the delights of the chase, or the dangers of the sea, the pursuit of arms, or the joy of battle.

Picturesque in costume, splendid in muscular development, trained in the use of arms, proud of their race, loyal to their clan, they boasted their fidelity to their friends, and that they never turned their backs to a foe. Restless, inclined to travel, quick to adapt themselves to new surroundings, the Highlanders of Scotland sought their fortunes abroad, rising to fame and wealth in many a Continental country, becoming the leaders in trade and commerce, in Colonial enterprise and in war, in all parts of the Northern Hemisphere. Frugal, industrious, persevering and brave, success rewarded their undertakings. Characterised beyond all else by loyalty to their King, they were the most devoted of the adherents of the ill-fated house of Stuart, and they gathered around that fatal standard with romantic devotion. To their loyalty this land is indebted for not a few of its best citizens and noblest heroes. The land of the Highlanders—Bonnie Scotland—has given to the world in all departments of life, great men who have taken conspicuous parts in its history in war and peace. The men from the land of Bobby Burns have made their impress on the age and on the people among whom they have lived, and none occupies a higher niche in its Hall of Fame than General Hugh Mercer.

Hugh Mercer was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in the year 1725. He descended on his paternal side from a long line of ministers of the Church of Scotland. The Rev. William Mercer, his father, was in charge of the Manse at Pittsligo, Aberdeenshire, from 1720 to 1748, and although some biographers of Mercer give the date of his birth as 1721, the records of this church show that he was baptised in 1726; it is therefore thought now, that more accurate history should place his birth in the year 1725. On his mother's side he was closely related to the Munro family; her name being Anna Munro, daughter of Sir Robert Munro, who fought with conspicuous distinction in the British Army at Fontenoy, on the Continent, and elsewhere; and who, ordered home to oppose the young Pretender, was killed in 1746 while commanding British troops at the Battle of Falkirk.

Mercer matriculated in the School of Medicine of Marschall College in the year 1740, graduating in the year 1744. He had hardly commenced the practice of his profession ere Prince Charlie made his "dash for a throne" which startled and, for a while, stupefied the British by its daring and brilliancy, but which was very ephemeral in its existence. The Scotch, especially those from the Highlands, were always loyal to the House of Stuart, and "Wha shall be King but Charlie?" as it was played on the bagpipes by the kilted Highlanders, his admiration for the people whom the Pretender represented, and his convictions of the justice of his cause, stirred up the martial and patriotic spirit of Hugh Mercer, who joined Charles Edward's Army as an Assistant Surgeon. History and tradition are both silent as to when Mercer "linked his fortune and his fate" to the cause of the Pretender. Whether he was on the fatal field of Falkirk on January 17, 1746, we have no record; but on April 16, 1746, at Culloden, near Inverness, he is found in the army of Prince Charles. The Duke of Cumberland was on that day in command of the Royal forces against the Highlanders, and when the sun went down on the field of carnage, Mercer shared with his chieftain the gloom of his defeat—a defeat that marked the end of the ambition of the Pretender and the hopes of the Stuarts. The victorious shouts of the army of the Duke sounded a veritable dirge to a cause that was then irrevocably lost. The last grand stand had been made, and all was over.

Sir Walter Scott, with his splendid genius for picturing and portraying, in the "Tales of a Grandfather," gives a graphic account of the Battle of Culloden; an extract from which may not be inappropriate to embody in this sketch. After narrating the events of importance that led up to the battle, the marching and the counter-marching of the armies of Prince Charles and the Duke of Cumberland, and especially the unsuccessful night attack on April 15th by the Army of the Pretender, Sir Walter Scott wrote:

“As the lines approached each other the artillery opened their fire by which the Duke of Cumberland’s army suffered very little and that of the Highlanders a great deal, for the English guns being well served made lanes through the ranks of the enemy, while the French artillery scarcely killed a man. To remain steady and inactive under this galling fire would have been a trial to the best-disciplined troops, and it is no wonder that the Highlanders showed great impatience under an annoyance peculiarly irksome to their character; some threw themselves down to escape the artillery, some called out to advance, and a few broke their ranks and fled.

“The cannonade lasted for about an hour; at length the Clans became so impatient that Lord George Murray was about to give the order to advance, when the Highlanders from the centre and right wings rushed, without orders, furiously down, after their usual manner of attacking, sword in hand, being received with heavy fire both of cannon and grape-shot. They became so confused that they got huddled together in their onset, without any distinction of Clans or regiments. Notwithstanding this disorder, the fury of their charge broke through Munro's and Burrel's regiments, which formed the left of the Duke of Cumberland's line; but that General had anticipated the possibility of such an event, and had strengthened his second line so as to form a steady support in case any part of his first should give way. The Highlanders, partially victorious, continued to advance with fury, and although much disordered and partly disarmed (having thrown away their guns on the very first charge), they rushed on Sempill's Regiment, in the second line, with unabated fury. That steady corps was drawn up three deep, the first rank kneeling, and the third standing upright. They reserved their fire until the fugitives of Burrel's and Munro's broken regiments had escaped round the flanks and through the intervals of the second line. By this time the Highlanders were within a yard of the bayonet point, when Sempill's battalion poured in their fire with so much accuracy that it brought down a great many of the assailants, and forced the rest to turn back.

A few pressed on, but unable to break through Sempill's Regiment were bayoneted by the first rank. The attack of the Highlanders was the less efficient that on this occasion most of them had laid aside their targets, expecting a march rather than a battle.

“While the right of the Highland line sustained their national character, though not with their usual success, the MacDonnalds on the left seemed uncertain whether they would attack or not. It was in vain Lord George Murray called out to them, ‘Claymore,’ telling the murmurers of this haughty tribe ‘that if they behaved with their usual valor they would convert the left into the right and that he would in future call himself MacDonnald.’ It was equally in vain that the gallant Keppoch charged with a few of his near relations, while his Clan, a thing before unheard of, remained stationary.

“The Chief was near the front of the enemy and was exclaiming, with feelings that cannot be appreciated, ‘My God, have the children of my tribe forsaken me?’ At that instant he received several shots, which closed his earthly account, leaving him only time to advise his favorite nephew to shift for himself.

“The three regiments of the MacDonnalds were by this time aware of the rout of their right wing, and retreated in good order upon the second line. A body of cavalry from the right of the King’s army was commanded to attack them on their retreat, but was checked by a fire from the French pickets, who advanced to support the MacDonnalds. At the same moment another decisive advantage was gained by the Duke’s army over the Highland right wing. A body of horse making six hundred cavalry, with three companies of Argyleshire Highlanders, had been detached to take possession of the Park walls; the three companies of infantry had pulled down the east wall of the inclosure and put to the sword about a hundred of the insurgents to whom its defense had been assigned. They then demolished the western wall, which permitted the dragoons, by whom they were accompanied, to ride through the inclosure and get out upon the open moor to the westward, and form so as to threaten the rear and flank of the Prince’s second line.

“Gordon of Abbachie, with his Lowland Aberdeenshire regiment, was ordered to fire upon these cavalry, which he did with some effect. The Campbells then lined the north wall of the inclosure and commenced a fire upon the right flank of the Highlanders' second line. That line, increased by the MacDonnalds, who retired upon it, still showed a great number of men keeping their ground, many of whom had not fired a shot. Lord Elcho rode up to the Prince and eagerly exhorted him to put himself at the head of those troops who yet remained and make a last exertion to recover the day and at least die like one worthy of having contended for a crown."

But all this was too late—the Pretender had been defeated; and his army, broken and shattered, fled from the field, hotly pursued by the Duke of Cumberland and his army. Of the treatment of the fallen and their allies, Sir Walter Scott thus writes: "The soldiers had orders to exercise towards the unfortunate natives the utmost extremities of war; they shot, therefore, the male inhabitants who fled at their approach; they plundered the houses of the chieftains; they burnt the cabins of the peasants; they were guilty of every outrage against women, old age, and infancy, and where the soldiers fell short of these extremities it was their own mildness of temper or that of some officer of gentler mood which restrained the license of their hand."

And in conclusion, in his discussion of this battle, its causes and its results, Sir Walter Scott wrote: "Looking at the whole in a general point of view, there can be no doubt that it presents a dazzling picture to the imagination, being a romance of real life, equal in splendour and interest to any which could be devised by fiction. A primitive people, residing in a remote quarter of the empire and themselves but a small portion of the Scottish Highlanders, fearlessly attempted to place the British Crown on the head of the last scion of those ancient kings whose descent was traced to their own mountains.

"This gigantic task they undertook in favor of a youth of twenty-one, who landed on their shore without support of any kind and threw himself on their generosity. They assembled an army in his behalf with men unaccustomed to arms, the amount of the most efficient part of which never exceeded two thousand; they defeated two disciplined armies commanded by officers of experience and reputation, penetrated deep into England, approached within ninety miles of the capital, made the Crown tremble on the King's head, and were only suppressed by concurrent disadvantages which it was impossible for human nature to surmount. It is, therefore, natural that this civil strife should have been long the chosen theme of the poet, the musician, and the novelist.”

In his flight, the Pretender was like a hare hunted by hounds. Flora MacDonal, a Scottish maiden, foiled his pursuers; and at length he reached France in safety. His loyal and loving followers found refuge in any way possible, hunted down, mercilessly butchered when caught. The terrible tragedy of the battle was as nothing compared to the butchery of these fugitives by the relentless and implacable Duke of Cumberland. Historians may differ as to the right and righteousness of the cause of Prince Charles Edward. None can deny that William, Duke of Cumberland, has rightly written his name as infamous by his treatment of the fallen foe. Campbell sweetly though sadly sang of Culloden:

Lochiel, Lochiel, beware of the day
When the Lowlands shall meet thee in battle array;
For a field of the dead rushes red on my sight,
And the Clans of Culloden are scattered in flight.

They rally, they bleed, for their kingdom
and crown;

Woe, woe to the riders that trample them down.

For dark and despairing my sight I may seal,

But man cannot cover what God would reveal;

'Tis the sunset of life gives me mystical lore,

And coming events cast their shadows before.

I tell thee, Culloden's dread echoes shall ring

With the bloodhounds that bark for their fugitive king.

CHAPTER II

HAVING, as has been before stated, fallen under the shadow of a great sorrow by the disastrous ending of the Battle of Culloden, and having eluded the vigilance of the minions of the "Bloody Butcher," Dr. Hugh Mercer, in the fall of the year 1746, embarked at Leith for America, landing a few weeks thereafter at Philadelphia. He did not remain long, however, in that city, but made his home on the western borders of the State of Pennsylvania, near what was then known as Greencastle, now Mercersburg. And for some years he practised his profession as a physician and, what was customary in those days, as an apothecary. In that then sparsely settled section, the territory over which he rode, dispensing calomel and using the lancet, was very large. Among the varied experiences of this eventful and heroic life, none proved more helpful and beneficial than the arduous, unselfish years spent as a country doctor in Colonial times on the frontier of civilisation in Pennsylvania, a profession for which he was well fitted by education and training, and by the high qualities of endurance, patience, skill and courage. For the country doctor's life of that day needed all the strength of body and of brain, the steadfast will and tireless energy. It was a wild and busy life in an unsettled region of scattered homes; distance and danger were daily encountered, for the Indians still hovered upon the frontier, and life and liberty were often imperiled by their unexpected attacks.

To this strange chance of fate and fortune came the soldier-surgeon of Culloden, and here he lived and labored for many years, amid privation and peril, dauntless and devoted; friend, healer, counsellor, benefactor to all within the circle of his far-reaching ministry of comfort and cure—the country doctor of the past. How shall we picture a life, a man, so worthy of reproduction and remembrance?

“God gives to every man
The virtue, temper, understanding, taste,
That lifts him into life, and lets him fall
Just in the niche he has ordained to fill.”

Known to all the inhabitants of the region round about, loved and welcomed everywhere, believed in and looked up to as one who not only healed the sick, but one who strengthened the weak, comforted the weary, and cheered the sorrowing, Hugh Mercer's life as a country doctor day by day in active duty, with saddle-bags filled with remedies for human ills, the old-fashioned medicines and the ever-ready lancet for bloodletting, was a splendid preparation for the hardships and privations he was in the future called upon to endure. A life of hardship ennobled by duty well done, and consecrated by self-sacrifice.

It was a rough school, but a thorough one, in which the country doctor learned the lessons of life. As he rode amid the forest solitudes, vigilant, alert, or visited the waiting homes to which his presence brought succor and relief, his memories of the past merged in duties of the present, with only faith and fortitude as guides upon the way, his life might have seemed unsatisfying to a nature less hopeful, less heroic. All honor to this man, and the many like him, whose daily round of sympathetic toil is brightened by the approval of his conscience and the benedictions of suffering humanity. The country doctor's lasting monument lives in the hearts that loved and revered him; and no higher tribute to his memory can be written than the tender and inspiring words of heavenly recognition and reward, "I was sick and ye visited me."

It was a history-making era, that of the year of 1755—the time of Braddock's disastrous defeat by the French and Indians, in his attempt to capture Fort Duquesne. There and then George Washington's splendid career began, and there Mercer made his first public and prominent appearance as a Captain in the ill-fated army of Braddock, conspicuous for his bravery on the memorable July 9, 1755, of which has been said, "The Continentals gave the only glory to that humiliating disaster." "History," says another, "furnishes few pages so replete with instances of official incompetence and consequent failure as that expedition, yet in the list of its Colonial heroes, the name of Hugh Mercer stands ever bright." In this engagement, Mercer was severely wounded; and, having been left behind by his own army in its panic-stricken flight, after a perilous tramp through a trackless wild, he at length rejoined his comrades and again commenced the work of healing the sick at his old locality.

The Indians with their French allies becoming very aggressive and warlike, its residents for self-protection formed themselves into military associations of which Colonel Armstrong was made Commander. In one of these companies Hugh Mercer was made Captain. His commission as such is dated March, 1756, and he was given the supervision of a very large territory, with Bridgeport (then called McDowell's Fort) as his headquarters.

During all this time he practised as a physician among the people and as surgeon to the garrison. In one of these Indian fights he was again wounded and abandoned to his foes. "Closely pursued by his savage foes," says a very interesting historian, "he providentially found a place of safety in the hollow trunk of a tree, around which the Indians rested and discussed the prospect of scalping him in the near future. When they had taken their departure, he took out in another direction and completely outwitted them." Sick with his wounds and worn out with his recent struggles, he began a lonely march of over a hundred miles through an unbroken forest. To sustain existence, he was compelled to live on roots and herbs, the carcass of a rattlesnake proving his most nourishing and palatable meal. He finally succeeded in rejoining his command at Fort Cumberland. He was in command of one of the companies which captured an Indian settlement at Kittanning in 1756, but was again wounded. In recognition and appreciation of his services, sacrifices and sufferings in these Indian wars, as well as his deeds of daring, the Corporation of Philadelphia presented him with a note of thanks and a splendid memorial medal.

Mercer was placed in command of the garrison at Shippensburg in the summer of 1757, and was promoted to the rank of Major in December of that year, and placed in command of the forces of the province of Pennsylvania west of the Susquehanna. In that year, 1758, he was in command of a part of the expedition of General Forbes against Fort Duquesne. Whether Hugh Mercer met George Washington at Braddock's defeat, or at the headquarters of the Forbes expedition against Fort Duquesne, there seems to be some conflict of opinion and statement among his biographers. The time and place of that meeting is of no very material moment. One thing seems to be absolutely certain, that they did meet, and an attachment sprang up between them which lasted as long as Mercer lived. And, further, that as a result of that meeting and that attachment, on the advice and at the suggestion of Washington, Virginia became the home of Hugh Mercer, and the State of Pennsylvania lost him as a citizen.

CHAPTER III

SOME TIME after the end of the French-Indian wars on the western borders of Pennsylvania, Hugh Mercer moved to Fredericksburg, Virginia; and during his residence in that town another Scotchman lived there, a fellow-citizen, one whose name was destined to "go down the ages, sung by poets and sages"—John Paul Jones! John Paul had only one home in America, and that was Fredericksburg. There his brother, William Paul, lived and died. There he lies buried. It was while John Paul was in Fredericksburg that he added Jones to his name, and from there he went forth as a Lieutenant of the Continental Navy. These two illustrious Scotchmen, Hugh Mercer and John Paul Jones, no doubt often met and talked of the land of their birth beyond the seas. Both, however, became illustrious in the cause of the Colonies in their struggle to be free from the domination of Great Britain, even though Scotland was one of its constituent territories. In Fredericksburg, Mercer commenced the practice of his profession as a physician, his residence for a number of years being a two-story frame house on the corner of Princess Ann and Amelia streets. His office and apothecary shop was located in the building now standing at the corner of Main and Amelia streets.

An English traveller in 1784 published an account of a visit that he had made to Fredericksburg during the Revolution, and made this statement:

“I arrived in Fredericksburg and put up at an inn kept by one Weedon, who is now a general officer in the American Army, and who was then very active and zealous in blowing the flames of sedition. In Fredericksburg, I called upon a worthy and intimate friend, Dr. Hugh Mercer, a physician of great eminence and merit, and, as a man, possessed of almost every virtue and accomplishment. Dr. Mercer was afterwards Brigadier-General in the American Army, to accept of which appointment I have reason to believe he was greatly influenced by General Washington, with whom he had been long in intimacy and bonds of friendship. For Dr. Mercer was generally of a just and moderate way of thinking and possessed of liberal sentiments and a generosity of principle very uncommon among those with whom he embarked.”

The inn to which this traveller referred was “The Rising Sun Tavern,” now standing on upper Main Street; and Weedon, who he said was actively engaged in blowing the flames of sedition, was brother-in-law of Mercer. This intensely loyal son of Great Britain was evidently a great admirer of Hugh Mercer; while he characterised the so-called disloyal colonist as wanting in that generosity of principle with which Mercer, he said, was greatly endowed.

Life in the quiet town of Fredericksburg during these years was uneventful. Mercer pursued the even tenor of his way as a country doctor, always a welcome guest in the hospitable homes of its people; he attended the meetings of Lodge No. 4, A. F. & A. M., of which he and George Washington were members, and occasionally paid a visit to the future “Father of his Country” at Mount Vernon.

Some time in the spring of 1775, a horseman suddenly dashed up the quiet streets of his town with the startling news that Virginia’s Royal Governor, Dunmore, at Williamsburg, the capital, had removed the Colonial store of gunpowder from the magazine to the British man-of-war Magdalen. This tyrannical and aggressive act upon the part of Dunmore only intensified the mutterings of discontent already existing in the colony, and added fuel to the flames that were already burning. Messengers were at once dispatched to the adjoining counties urging decisive action, and the horsemen and footmen came pouring in. A meeting was then called, and an organization perfected of which we have this record:

“Election of officers of minutemen and regulars for Caroline, Spotsylvania, King George and Stafford counties, Virginia, September 12, 1775. At a meeting of the select committee for the district of this county, the counties of Caroline, Stafford, King George and Spotsylvania, the following officers were elected:

“Minutemen—Hugh Mercer, Colonel; Mordecai Buckner, Lieutenant-Colonel; Robert Johnson, Major.

And “Mercer’s Minutemen” commenced

the march to Williamsburg. Before proceeding very far, it is said that George Mason and others urged them to reconsider and wait for further and fuller information and not to act too hastily; and the cooler counsels of these advisers prevailed. Of this, Alexander Spotswood, in a letter to George Washington of date April 30, 1775, wrote:

“I am extremely glad to inform you that after a long debate it was agreed that we should not march to Williamsburg.”

Four days later, George Washington set out from Mount Vernon for the Continental Congress. The abandonment of the undertaking may have been brought about by the want of ammunition, as Mercer wrote to Washington on April 25, 1775:

“We are not sufficiently supplied with powder; it may be proper to request of the gentlemen who join us from Fairfax and Prince William to come provided with an over-proportion of that article.”

Returning to the town, they appointed a Committee of Safety and adopted a set of resolutions in which they pledged their sacred honor to resist all attempts against their rights and liberties, from whatever quarter they might be assailed, and agreed to be in readiness to defend the laws, the liberties and the rights of this or any sister colony from unjust and wicked invasion by force of arms, concluding with, "God save the liberties of America." It is claimed that this Declaration is prior in time to that of Mecklenburg, North Carolina, as it is to that of the Continental Congress at Philadelphia.

A thoughtful writer defines history as "philosophy teaching by example." If this be so, historic Fredericksburg ranks high in the rôle of great names and great deeds. Of the men who made our history in Colonial days, before and during the Revolutionary War, many were identified with that old town, visited there, met together in friendly converse or earnest counsel, and discussed the grave questions of the hour—England's oppressive measures and the resistance of the Colonies, the rights involved, the liberties invaded, and the crisis inevitable. George Washington was often there; Fredericksburg was the home of his mother. Hugh Mercer lived there as a physician; James Monroe, lawyer (who later led the advance of the Americans in the battle of Trenton and afterwards became President), also resided there; John Marshall, afterward Chief Justice, and George Mason of Gunston Hall, leaders of thought, patriots of action, all found Fredericksburg a pleasant and convenient meeting place in those days, ominous of threatening strife and deadly conflict.

In September, 1774, the General Congress of the Colonies met in Philadelphia, the assembled delegates representing the best and wisest, the most determined and patriotic men of the land. Peyton Randolph, of Virginia, was chosen president; and a declaration of rights and a series of resolutions were adopted which "for solidity of reasoning, force of sagacity, and wisdom of conclusion" have never been excelled. The session ended on the 26th of October, and it was recommended that another Congress meet in May, 1775. The war-cloud was lowering.

In March, 1775, the Virginia Convention assembled in St. John's Church, Richmond, and Patrick Henry's magnetic eloquence, his splendid rallying cry of "Liberty or death," stirred all hearts to decision and action. During these months of hesitation, anxiety, possible compromise, yet continued aggression, we can imagine this group of patriots in Fredericksburg keenly alive to the hazardous trend of public affairs which culminated in open hostilities at Lexington and Concord. The Rising Sun tavern was then the centre of public entertainment; and its genial host was Mr. George Weedon, who afterwards became a Major-General in the Continental Army. The cosy apartments of the inn, its bright wood fires and comfortable surroundings, induced good-fellowship and free exchange of opinions. There was no need of argument, as all were true patriots. It was surely as picturesque a scene as history ever painted—those men in conversation at the “Rising Sun!” Washington, wise and calm; Mercer, with patriotic power and battle memories surging in his heart; impetuous Paul Jones, eager for the fray; young Monroe, summing up the wrongs of the Colonies, and ready to avenge them; Marshall, the learned jurist, the great advocate of justice, and George Mason, one of the great lights of history, whose genius illuminated the cause and established its principles. Can we not see them all, great men, whose example lives still, whose names are blazoned on “the roll-call of the immortals.”

Madam Washington, as she was called, lived not far from the Rising Sun tavern, and would have enjoyed the earnest discussions therein (which no doubt George reported to her), as her sterling good sense and keen observation made her opinions of decided weight and influence.

After the removal of the powder, above referred to, the news of unjustifiable acts of aggression by the Crown in other Colonies came thick and fast. Events with startling rapidity followed one after another. Concord and Lexington had been heard from; Virginia's Patrick Henry had uttered the words that were heard around the world; and the Revolution was inaugurated. Three regiments were formed. Henry was made Colonel of the First, elected over Hugh Mercer by one vote in a contest for the colonelcy.

William Woodford of Caroline County became Colonel of the Second, and Mercer, Colonel of the Third Regiment, of which his brother-in-law, Weedon, was the Lieutenant-Colonel; and Thomas Marshall of Fauquier County, the father of John Marshall who afterwards became Chief Justice, was the Major. About this time, Mercer, who had married Miss Isabella Gordon, daughter of John Gordon, resided in what is known as "The Sentry-Box," on lower Main Street, a house which is still in good condition and well preserved.

The election of Mercer to the colonelcy of this Third Regiment was a veritable case of the "office seeking the man," for when the storm-cloud of war first appeared, Mercer made an offer of his services to the Virginia Convention in these expressive but brief words: "Hugh Mercer will serve his adopted country and the cause of Liberty in any rank or station to which he may be assigned," words which found their echo in what he said later.

"We are not engaged," said he, "in a war of ambition, or I should not have been here. Every man should be content to serve in that station in which he can be most useful. For my part, I have but one object in view, and that is, the success of the cause; and God can witness how cheerfully I would lay down my life to secure it."

William Wirt, in his Life of Patrick Henry, has this to say in connection with Mercer's appointment:

"Three Regiments of one thousand men each was first determined on, and Patrick Henry's friends nominated him for Colonel of the First Regiment, it having been determined that this officer should be the Commander-in-Chief of the forces to be raised. The opposition united on Dr. Hugh Mercer of Fredericksburg, who had served with great distinction under Washington in the French and Indian War of 1755. It is no wonder that men, with so much at stake, should have hesitated to place in command of their entire forces a man of no military experience (Patrick Henry), however great his abilities as a civilian. The first ballot stood for Hugh Mercer 41, for Patrick Henry 40, for Thomas Nelson 8, and for William Woodford 1.

“The second ballot between the two highest resulted in the election of Mr. Henry, although Mercer and Woodford were officers of experience and ability. Nothing but the conviction of the majority that the qualities which made Mr. Henry a great political leader would also make him a good Colonel can explain their action in preferring him (Patrick Henry) as the Commander-in-Chief of the Virginia forces. Mercer was objected to for being a North Briton. In answer to this objection it was admitted that Mercer was born in Scotland, but that he came to America in his early years and had constantly resided in it from his first coming over; that his family and all his other connections were in this colony; that he had uniformly distinguished himself as a warm and firm friend of the rights of America; and what was a principal consideration, that he possessed great military as well as literary abilities. Mr. Nelson acknowledged Mercer's military abilities, declared he would not oppose his appointment, and hoped that he himself would not be voted for. Mr. Woodford, who was not at that time a member of the Convention, spoke much in favor of Mercer, declaring that he was willing to serve under him, as he knew him to be a fine officer."

Mercer's election is thus recorded in the proceedings of the Virginia Convention:

"Wednesday, January 10, 1776, Convention proceeded by ballot to the appointment of a Colonel of the Third Regiment, and there was a majority of the whole Convention in favor of Hugh Mercer. Resolved, therefore, that the said Hugh Mercer be appointed Colonel of the Third Regiment."

When the Committee of Safety heard of Mercer's appointment, it passed these resolutions:

"The committee of the county, to express their approbation of the appointment of Col. Mercer, and to pay a tribute justly due to the noble and patriotic conduct which that gentleman has uniformly pursued since the commencement of our disputes with the Mother Country, which was so strikingly displayed on that occasion, entered into the following resolve:

“Resolved, That the thanks of this committee be presented to Colonel Hugh Mercer, Commander-in-Chief of the Battalion of Minute Men in the District of this County, and the counties of Caroline, Stafford, and King George; expressing the high sense of the importance of his appointment to that station, and our acknowledgements of his public spirit in sacrificing his private interest to the service of his Country.

“ALEXANDER DICK, Clerk.”

And Colonel Mercer, at the head of his regiment, with his fife and drum, marched away from his adopted Virginia home, bidding good-by to his wife, children, and friends—“whom God ordained and the fates decreed” he should never, in this world, see again.

CHAPTER IV

COLONEL MERCER was ordered at once to report to Williamsburg—then the capital of Virginia—where there was a considerable encampment of troops. A writer in a very old periodical gives us an interesting account of Mercer while there, from which we quote:

“The commencement of the American Revolution found him in the midst of an extensive medical practice, surrounded by affectionate friends, and enjoying in the bosom of a happy family all the comforts of social life. Stimulated to action by a lofty spirit of patriotism, he broke from the endearments of domestic life, and gave to his country in that trying hour the energy and resources of a practiced and accomplished soldier. In 1775 he was in command of three regiments of minute men, and early in 1776 we find him zealously engaged, as Colonel of the Army of Virginia, in drilling and organizing the raw and ill-formed masses of men who, under the varied names of sons of liberty, minutemen, volunteers, and levies, presented the bulk without the order, the mob without the discipline, of an army. To produce obedience and subordination among men who had entered into the war unpaid and unrestricted by command, was a severe and invidious task.

The courage, the fortitude, the self-possession of Colonel Mercer quailed not at these adverse circumstances, and, by the judicious exercise of mingled severity and kindness, he soon succeeded in reducing a mutinous soldiery to complete submission. Tradition has preserved the following anecdote, illustrating, in a striking manner, his characteristic promptitude and bravery :

Among the troops which arrived at Williamsburg, then the metropolis of Virginia, was a company of riflemen from beyond the mountains, commanded by Captain Gibson. A reckless insubordination and a violent opposition to military restraint had gained for this corps the sarcastic name of "Gibson's Lambs." They had not been long in camp before a mutiny arose among them, producing much excitement in the army, and alarming the inhabitants of the city. Freed from all command, they roamed through the camp, threatening with instant death any officer who would presume to exercise authority over them. In the height of the rebellion an officer was dispatched with the alarming tidings to the quarters of Colonel Mercer. The citizens of the town vainly implored him not to risk his life and person amid this infuriated mob.

Reckless of personal safety, he instantly repaired to the barracks of the mutinous band, and directing a general parade of the troops, he ordered Gibson's company to be drawn up as offenders and violators of law, and to be disarmed in his presence. The ringleaders were placed under a strong guard, and in the presence of the whole army he addressed the offenders in an eloquent and feeling manner, impressing on them their duties as citizens and soldiers, and the certainty of death if they continued to disobey their officers and remained in that mutinous spirit, equally disgraceful to them and hazardous to the sacred interests they had marched to defend. Disorder was instantly checked, and, after a short confinement, those under imprisonment were released; the whole company was ever after as exemplary in deportment and conduct as any troop in the army.

On June 5, 1776, Mercer was promoted and made a Brigadier-General in the Continental Army, of which the following correspondence gives evidence:

“President of Congress to General Mercer, Philadelphia, June 6, 1776. Sir: I am directed by Congress to inform you that they yesterday appointed you a Brigadier-General in the armies of the United Colonies, and that they request you will immediately on receipt hereof set out for headquarters at New York; for which purpose I am commanded to forward you this by express. Should you take Philadelphia in your way, I must beg you will do me the favor to call at my house, as it is highly probable I shall have something in charge from Congress ready for you at that time. I do myself the pleasure to enclose your commission; and have the honor to be, sir,

“Your most obedient and very humble servant,

“J. HANCOCK, President.

“To Brigadier-General Mercer, Virginia.”

“Williamsburg, June 15, 1776.

“Sir: I had the honor yesterday to receive your letter of the 6th inst., together with a commission, appointing me a Brigadier-General in the army of the United Colonies.

“Give me leave, sir, to request of you to present to the honorable Congress my most grateful acknowledgements in this distinguished mark of their respect.

“I was on duty with part of my regiment before Gwinn’s Island, where Lord Dunmore has taken possession, when your instructions reached me; in consequence of this I shall use my utmost diligence, after settling the accounts of my regiment, to wait on you in Philadelphia. I have the honor to be, sir,

“Your most obedient, humble servant,

“HUGH MERCER.

“To the Honorable John Hancock, Esquire.”

General Washington soon afterward appointed him to take full command of the troops at Paulus Hook, and charged him with the duty of directing the movement of a large detachment of Pennsylvania Militia and of protecting that point against a threatening invasion by the enemy from Staten Island. The latter part of the year 1776 the Colonists, with bated breath, feared the end of their struggle for liberty had come. New York and Rhode Island had been left in the hands of the British. Washington slowly withdrew from New Jersey, stubbornly disputing every effort to bring on an engagement; he crossed the Delaware; as the Royalists approached he retreated; at last he took refuge beyond that river, and for a distance of many miles he withdrew all the boats on its shores to its right bank, in order to impede Cornwallis in case he attempted to cross. The army of the Colonists was poorly clad, many of them barefooted; without tents, with few blankets, and very scantily fed, they were confronted by Cornwallis with a splendidly equipped army, well provisioned and clothed.

The British Hessians were then in possession of Trenton, and had to a large extent the practical control of the State of New Jersey. Sir William Howe boasted that Philadelphia would fall when the Delaware became frozen. At this critical juncture, on Christmas night, Washington crossed the Delaware amid a blinding storm of snow and sleet. His passage became much impeded by floating ice, but with the rallying cry of "Victory or death," he executed that brilliant movement on December 26, at Trenton, which caused the loyal though much depressed pa-triot's to renew their fast-wasting courage.

By this coup-de-main, Washington captured in the battle fought in Trenton about one thousand stands of arms, one thousand prisoners, and many stores of ammunition, with a large amount of provisions and clothing. This, with a bounty of ten dollars in gold to his troopers, restored fresh confidence in his rank and file, and caused the Continentals whose term of enlistment was about to expire to remain under the new flag of the Colonists for some weeks longer. For this brilliant victory historians, with one accord, give credit and glory to Mercer. Major Armstrong, his aide-de-camp, who was present at a council of officers, and who was with Mercer at the crossing of the Delaware, is authority for the statement that Mercer suggested this expedition, fraught with so much peril and uncertainty.

General Howe, who was amazed at Washington's intrepid boldness, and stunned by his great success, immediately ordered Cornwallis by a forced march to stop this onward advance. About five thousand men were pushed to Trenton, while a larger body of men was held in reserve; and on January 2d they met the advance line of the Continental Army at Laurens-ville. The British drove them back, and about sunset of that day reached Trenton. Washington, having carefully guarded the ford and bridge, drew up his army beyond the Assanpenk. This skirmish caused a great loss in killed and wounded, and the fate of the struggling Colonies was held tremblingly in the balance. Had Cornwallis forced the fight that night with his vastly superior and much better equipped troops, it is possible that the fate of the Colonists would have been sealed. He was urged to make the attack, but refused, giving as an excuse the fatigue of his troops, saying "that he had the old fox just where he wanted him, and would catch him in the morning," a morning which never came to him, so far as catching the "old fox" was concerned.

Washington was now confronted with great peril. The army of Cornwallis in front and the Delaware in the rear, retreat was impossible; an open engagement was nearly certain to result in defeat; and defeat at this pivotal point in the life of the Colonies meant the destruction of their government and death to their hope for that liberty for which they longed and had suffered and sacrificed so much. At a council of war held in General Mercer's headquarters that night, the determination and decision was reached to withdraw the Continental forces from in front of the enemy and go around him and attack the detachment then at Princeton; for by the Providence of God, the roads were made passable by being frozen, or else such a perilous expedition could not have been accomplished.

The pickets of the two armies were within two hundred yards of one another, and only a small stream, called the Assanpenk, was between them. In order to deceive the enemy, a long line of fire was kept up in Washington's front while his army was slowly on its way to Princeton, and thus deceived, the enemy slept. The "old fox" had escaped, as Cornwallis, much to his dismay, found in the morning.

A woman guided the Continental Army on that march beset with so many perils and difficulties. A woman! Her loyalty, her devotion, her sacrifice, and her sufferings for the cause of the Colony have given and shall ever give her all honor, praise, and gratitude.

Washington passed safely around the post of General Leslie at Maidenhead, but his progress was so slow that it was sunrise when he reached Stonybrook, about two miles from Princeton. He formed his column at the Quaker meeting house, which is still well preserved, at Princeton. The van and rearguard was composed of Continental soldiers who had bared their breasts to many a storm of shot and shell; the center was composed of troops who were first baptized with fire at Trenton. Washington ordered forward a detachment of about four hundred men under Mercer, consisting of the First Virginia Regiment, Shamwood's Regiment from Maryland, and Colonel Haslett's Delaware Regiments, with Neal's Battery, to seize a bridge at Worth's Mill. This detachment marched to the left from the road that leads along the brook, while Washington took a by-road to the right, in the rear of the Clark house; this road led directly to Princeton.

The Seventeenth, the Fortieth, and the Fifty-fifth British regiments, and three troops of Dragoons, had slept that night at Princeton, and had already begun their march to Trenton. The night had been dark and dreary, and the morning was severely cold; the Seventeenth Regiment having crossed the bridge, occupied a hill beyond it.

Mercer's presence was revealed at day-

break, and Mawhood at once counter-marched his regiment and crossed the bridge at Worth's Mill before Mercer could reach it, each side being surprised by the presence of the other. Each army tried to gain the high ground west of Clark's house. The Colonists reached it first, and from behind a worm fence opened fire, which was quickly responded to by the British.

The British troops charged after the third volley, and the Colonists were driven back in disorder before a bayonet charge from a force vastly superior in numbers. At this point General Mercer dismounted from his horse, which had been disabled, and tried vainly to rally his men; while he was doing so, he was knocked down by the butt-end of a musket in the hand of a British trooper, who demanded that he should surrender, which he refused to do. He was then bayoneted and left for dead on the battle-field. (This spot has been marked by the erection of a white pillar.)

As soon as Washington heard this firing, he ordered forward the Pennsylvania Militia and Moulder's Battery to the assistance of Mercer; thus reinforced, the flight of the Continentals was stopped, and the British were made to halt in their pursuit. At this critical moment Washington appeared in person, and taking in the situation of affairs at a glance, he waved his hat and cheered on his troops. Washington was now between the firing lines of both armies, and was in great danger and great peril. Moulder's Battery poured volley after volley into the ranks of the enemy, and the roar of musketry followed, as the brave Rhode Islanders and the Virginia Seventh swung, with other Continentals, into line, causing the enemy to break and fly, followed by victorious shouts from the American Army.

As the smoke of battle cleared away, it revealed Washington unharmed. Colonel Fitzgerald, his aide-de-camp, galloped to his side and said, "Thank God, your excellency is safe!" Washington replied, "Away, my dear Colonel, and bring up the troops; the day is our own."

The rout of the British was complete. Mawhood escaped with some of his scattered and shattered troops to Maidenhead. Some fled up Stonybrook; many were captured by a body of cavalry from Philadelphia.

General St. Clair met on this retreat the Fifty-fifth Regiment of British soldiers and quickly put them to flight; a portion of the Fortieth Regiment, which had not been in the engagement, took refuge in Nassau Hall, Princeton, and were captured.

And thus on the morning of January 3, 1777, the Battle of Princeton, which was of short duration, but momentous of great results, was fought and won; and the shout of victory that commenced there was not hushed until at Yorktown the end came—an end which marks the beginning of our Republic, which is to-day the wonder of the world.

It is needless and unnecessary in this biography of General Mercer to recount the further movements, marches, and counter-marches of Washington and his army. In this battle General Mercer, “who seems to have excited the brutality of the British by the gallantry of his resistance,” was stabbed by their bayonets in seven different parts of his body, and they inflicted on his head many blows with the butt-end of their muskets, only ceasing this butchery when they believed him dead.

As soon after the battle as possible, General Mercer was removed to an adjacent farmhouse, owned by Mr. Clark, where Mrs. Clark and her daughter tenderly nursed him, being assisted by Major Lewis, who was delegated by General Washington to go there for that purpose. Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia, and Dr. Archibald Alexander, of Augusta County, Virginia, who was then a surgeon of the Virginia troops, were at Mercer's bedside doing everything possible to alleviate his sufferings, which were intense and acute. Their services and ministrations were without avail, for on January 12, 1777, he died in the arms of Major Lewis. The angel of death wooed him to a brighter and better land, and the recording angel wrote in the great book, "Well done."

He had willingly sacrificed his life for the liberties of the people of his adopted land.

“For whether on the scaffold high,
Or in the battle's van,
The noblest death that man can die
Is when he dies for man.”

CHAPTER V

DESIRING to give the full benefit of what others thought and said of General Mercer and the great value of his services to the struggling Colonies, it cannot be thought inappropriate for me to reproduce here what has already been written of him, especially by those who were near him in the times of which they wrote. Among those was General James Wilkinson, who says :

“The first fire was delivered by General Mercer, which the enemy returned with a volley and a sudden charge; many of our men being armed with rifles, were forced, after the third round, to abandon the fence, and fled in disorder. On hearing the fire, General Washington directed the Pennsylvania Militia to support General Mercer, and in person led them on, with two pieces of artillery under Capt. Wm. Moulder, of the city of Philadelphia, who formed a battery on the right of Thomas Clark’s house; the enemy pursued the detachment of General Mercer as far as the brow of the declivity, etc. At the time General Mercer engaged the Seventeenth Regiment, under Colonel Hand, and endeavored by a right movement to turn the enemy's left flank, etc.'"

In this affair our numerical loss was inconsiderable—it did not exceed 30, and only 14 were buried in the field; but it was of great magnitude in worth and talents. Colonels Haslett and Porter, Major Morris, and Capt. Wm. Shippen were respected in their corps; Captains Fleming and Neal presented fair promise of professional excellence; but in General Mercer was lost a chief who, for education, experience, talents, disposition, integrity and patriotism, was second to no man but the Commander-in-Chief, and was qualified to fill the highest trusts of the country. The manner in which he was wounded is an evidence of the excess to which the common soldiery are liable in the heat of action, especially when irritated by the loss of favorite officers. His way being obstructed, when advancing, by a post and rail fence in front of the orchard, it may be presumed that the General dismounted voluntarily, for he was on foot when the troops in the front hesitated, became confused, and soon gave way, while the few regulars in the rear could not check the dastardly retreat. Ere the fortune of the day was changed and victory perched on the patriot standard, the heroic Mercer fell. Rushing forward to rally his broken troops, and stimulating them by voice and example, his horse was shot from under him, and he fell, dangerously wounded, among the columns of the advancing enemy. Being thus dismounted, he was instantly surrounded by a number of British soldiers, with whom, when they refused him quarter, he fought desperately with drawn sword until he was completely overpowered. Excited to brutality by the gallantry of his resistance, they stabbed him with their bayonets in seven different parts of his body, and inflicted many blows on his head with the butt-ends of their muskets; nor did they cease their butchery until they believed him to be a crushed and mangled corpse. Nine days after the battle, he died in the arms of Major George Lewis, of the army, the nephew of General Washington, whom the uncle had commissioned to watch over the last moments of his expiring friend. His latter hours were soothed by the skillful and affectionate attendance of the distinguished Dr. Rush. He complained much of his head, and frequently remarked to his surgeon that "there was the principal danger," and Dr. Rush, in speaking of his patient's suffering, always ascribed his death more to the blows on the head than to the bayonet wounds, although several of these were attended with extreme danger.

In a small house not far distant from the blood-red plain of carnage and death, but far away from the soothing consolations of domestic affection, this distinguished martyr of liberty breathed his last.

The mangled body was removed under a military escort from Princeton to Philadelphia, and exposed a day in the Coffee house, with the idea of exciting by that mournful spectacle the indignation of the people. The Pennsylvania Evening Post for January 18, 1777, has thus recorded his death and funeral obsequies: "Last Sunday evening, died, near Princeton, of the wounds he received in the engagement at that place on the 3rd instant, Hugh Mercer, Esquire, Brigadier-General in the Continental Army. On Wednesday his body was brought to this city, and on Thursday buried on the south side of Christ Church, with military honors, attended by the Committee of Safety, the members of the Assembly, gentlemen of the army, and a number of the most respectable inhabitants of this city. The uniform character, exalted abilities, and intrepidity of this illustrious officer will render his name equally dear to America, with the liberty for which she is now contending, to the latest posterity.”

The battles of Trenton and Princeton, in which General Mercer fought and bled unto death, were the most brilliant and fortunate victories won in the War of the Revolution. The question of our independence was now no longer a matter of doubt. General Mercer's elevated character, lofty heroism, and brutal murder excited a deep and affectionate sympathy throughout all the Colonies. General Washington, in an official letter to the Continental Congress, thus alluded to Generals Mercer and Warren, Congress having, on April 7, 1777, resolved that a monument should be erected at Boston to the memory of General Warren, and one at Fredericksburg to General Mercer:

“The honors Congress has decreed to the memory of Generals Warren and Mercer afford me the highest pleasure. Their character and fortitude had a just claim to every mark of respect, and I heartily wish that every officer of the United States, emulating their virtues, may by their actions secure to themselves the same right to the grateful tributes of their country.”

On January 15, 1777, Washington wrote to Mr. Joseph Reed:

“When you see General Mercer, be so good as to present my best wishes to him—and congratulations (if the state of his health will admit of it) on his recovery from death. You may assure him that nothing but the confident assertion to me that he was either dead, or within a few minutes of dying, and that he was put into as good a place as I could remove him to, prevented his seeing me after the action and pursuit at Princeton.”

When that letter was written the hero of Princeton had passed to the Great Beyond. A further evidence and expression of the high estimation in which General Mercer was held by Washington is found in a letter from the latter to General Livingston, dated from headquarters, July 6, 1776, 5 o'clock P. M., in which he wrote:

“General Mercer has just set off for Jersey. In his experience and judgment you may repose great confidence. He will proceed to Amboy after conferring with you. You will please to keep me constantly informed of the proceedings of the enemy, and be assured of every assistance and attention.”

In the Journal of the Continental Congress for June 3 and July 19, 1776, what was known as the Flying Camp was constituted of ten thousand men, to be put under the command of such a Continental officer as General Washington should direct, and by his direction they assembled at Amboy, New Jersey, under the command of General Mercer.

General Washington, in another letter to General Livingston, of date July 5, 1776, referring to Mercer said: "His judgment and experience may be depended on;" and on January 5, 1777, in his official report to Congress, of the Battle of Princeton, after describing the battle and the capture of prisoners, etc., he said: "This piece of good fortune is counterbalanced by the loss of the brave and worthy General Mercer."

Nothing is needed further to show how the great Washington regarded Hugh Mercer, and to this I will add what was said of him by Lafayette on his last visit to this country.

The conversation in a brilliant company turning on the prominent men of the Revolution, one of the company observed to him that he, General Lafayette, was, of course, acquainted with General Mercer, not recollecting that Lafayette did not arrive in the United States until after the Battle of Princeton. "Oh, no," said the General, "you know that Mercer fell in January, 1777, and I reached the United States in the ensuing spring; but on my arrival I found the army and whole country so full of his name that an impression has been always left on my mind since that I was personally acquainted with him."

At Princeton the high tide of the Revolution was reached. Before then, gloom had settled on the cause of the Colonies. The Tories, with their "I told you so," predicted and prophesied a humiliating defeat, and the loyal Colonists began to doubt and despair. After that battle the bright sunshine of hope settled on this fair land of ours, and from that point the army of Washington fought to conquer; for the victory of Princeton not only encouraged the doubting and despairing rebels, as the Colonists were called, but it brought to them the recognition and alliance of France. That victory, however, was dearly gained, for amidst the exultant charge of our victorious legions could be heard the dying groans of that pure patriot—the brave and gallant Mercer.

“What death could finer laurel buy?
What grander ending can there be
Than for a noble man to die
To help to make his country free?”

Although the day was dearly bought,
'Twas there the Tyrant's doom was sealed,
And not in vain the fight was fought
When Mercer fell on Princeton Field.

“His sword will waste away with rust,
And tho' 'twere wrapped in cloth of gold,
Within the grave his precious dust
In time will mingle with the mold;
But he, himself, is canonized,
If saintly deeds such fame can give,
For long as Liberty is prized
HUGH MERCER'S NAME SHALL SURELY LIVE.”

January 28, 1841; Mrs George W. Morgan, of Philadelphia presented to the St. Andrews Society of that City, the sword of General Hugh Mercer. The sword had been handed to Brig. Gen. Jacob Morgan, Jr., who had, since he was 15 years of age, and knew Gen. Mercer at Fort Mifflin, where they fought side by side, and in the Frontier Forts of Penna., with his equally valourous father, Colonel Jacob Morgan of Morgantown, Berks Co., Penna.; known his fellow-fier who was at his side when he was lying at this door and bid him carry on the good fight with his sword. "Mercer died in the arms" of the bosom of his friend not only Major Lewis, - but of:
Brig. Gen. Jacob Morgan, Jr., 1741 - Sept 18, 1802. Buried in Christ Church Yd., Phila., Pa. Served (Rev War) Phila. B. Associates, and First Bn. Phila. Militia, becoming a Major in the State 1780.

CHAPTER VI

ON JANUARY 31, 1777, the Continental Congress passed the following resolution: "That a committee of four be appointed to consider what honors are due to the memory of General Mercer, who died on the 12th instant, of wounds received on the 3d of the same month, in fighting against the enemies of American liberty, near Princeton." The members of that committee were the Hon. Messrs. Rush, Heynard, Page, and S. Adams. On April 8, 1777, that committee reported "That a monument be erected to the memory of General Mercer at Fredericksburg, in the State of Virginia, with the following inscription:

Sacred to the memory of
HUGH MERCER,
Brigadier-General in the Army of The United States.
He died on the 12th of January, 1777, of the wounds he received on the 3rd of the same month,
Near Princeton, in New Jersey, Bravely defending the Liberties of America.
The Congress of the United States,
In testimony of his virtues and their gratitude,
Have caused this monument to be erected.”

The report of the committee was, however, never executed. Under that resolution no monument was ever built; why, no one knows. Nations, like some individuals, soon forget. For more than a century did this Republic fail in its duty to the memory of the gallant Mercer. At last the conscience, as well as the sense of justice, of the nation was aroused. Hence by an act of Congress, approved June 28, 1902, the resolution of 1777 was directed by Congress to be carried into effect, and at Fredericksburg, in the State of Virginia, there has been a monument erected to perpetuate the fame and name of Hugh Mercer. And it is well, "lest we forget, lest we forget." The same epitaph is engraved on this monument that was prescribed in the resolutions of 1777. The City of Philadelphia paid the memory of Mercer a great tribute by giving his remains a public funeral, which it is said 30,000 people attended. He was buried in the graveyard of Christ Church. In 1817 his son visited his grave; the old sexton—a Mr. Dolley—who had attended the funeral of the General, was there alone. Under the grass on the south side of the brick enclosure was found a plain and unadorned marble slab, inscribed "Gl. M. In memory of Gen'l Hugh Mercer, who fell at Princeton, January 3rd, 1777." The St. Andrew's Society afterward removed his remains to the Laurel Hill Cemetery and erected a monument to his memory, which was dedicated with imposing ceremonies on Thursday, November 26, 1840; on which occasion Wm. B. Reed, Esq., grandson of Adjutant-General Reed, of the Revolution, delivered a beautiful address. General Mercer had joined the St. Andrew's Society in Philadelphia, in 1757. On the front die of this monument, etc., is the following inscription:

Right-hand side of die:

General Mercer, a physician of Fredericksburg, in Virginia, was distinguished for his skill and learning, his gentleness and decision, his refinement and humanity, his elevated honour and his devotion to the great cause of civil and religious liberty.

In the historical paintings of the Battle of Princeton by Peale, at Princeton, and by Trumbull at New York, General Mercer is given a prominent position. And the states of Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Virginia, and New Jersey, have by solemn and appropriate acts of their respective Legislatures, named a county "Mercer" in his honor. On October 1, 1897, a bronze tablet was unveiled in Princeton, bearing this inscription:

"To the memory of General Hugh Mercer, the revered martyr of American Independence. Born in Scotland in 1720; educated as a physician; emigrated to America in 1747; was appointed by Congress, June 5th, 1776, a Brigadier-General in the American Army; was mortally wounded at the Battle of Princeton, January 3rd, 1777; and died in the house now standing near this spot January 12th, 1777. This tablet was erected by the Mercer Engine Company No. 3 of Princeton, N. J., October 1st, 1897, at the semi-centennial celebration.”

On this occasion Judge Beverly R. Wellford, of Richmond, Va., and Dr. Henry C. Cameron, of Princeton, made eloquent and appropriate historical orations.

In November, 1899, the Hon. Henry W. Green, of Trenton, N. J., presented a handsome portrait of General Mercer to the Mercersburg Academy of Pennsylvania; and in doing so, among other things, said:

“His life record shows him as a soldier, brave and courageous; as a physician, learned in his profession; as a scholar, well read and of generous attainments; as a patriot, pure and impulsive; as a Christian, self-sacrificing and true. Few lives illumine the page of national history with kindlier glow than that of Mercer. Fortunate the town with such a namesake; honored the school that bears his name; glorified the nation in whose cause he laid down that most precious of his possessions—his life.”

Hugh Mercer was an alumnus of Marschal College and the University of Aberdeen, Scotland, and this university recognizes him as one of its most illustrious students. In its annual list of honored alumni, he is one of the three chosen to represent the profession of arms; the other two being Field-Marshal James Keith, the distinguished officer in the service of Frederick the Great, and Sir James Outram, the "Bayard of India."

Congress, on motion of Thomas Jefferson, in 1784 made an appropriation for the education of General Mercer's youngest son, Hugh, who died at his residence, "The Sentry Box," December 2, 1853. Another son, John, a distinguished lawyer, died September 30, 1817; and his only daughter, Anna Gordon, who married Robert Patton, died in Fredericksburg, Va., May 12, 1832. General Hugh W. Mercer, of Savannah, Ga., a gallant officer in the Confederate Army, was a grandson of General Mercer, and the late John M. Patton, another grandson, was a member of Congress from the Fredericksburg District under Jackson's administration, and was acting-Governor of Virginia in 1840.

Now as the end of the story of the life of Hugh Mercer in this work approaches, by way of recapitulation it behooves us to ask, What were the most attractive and potential elements of that life? We would say, Fidelity to principle, fixedness of purpose, faithfulness in the discharge of the obligations imposed by citizenship, with a fearlessness that knew no limitation when duty and obligation joined in demanding energetic action. To realize that this is true, the reader need only be reminded of what was accomplished by Mercer, and how that accomplishment was brought about. We find him at Culloden obeying every inspiration of loyalty to Scotland and Scottish traditions when he championed the cause of the Pretender. To have done otherwise would have been contrary to every dictate of duty as it was impressed on Scotland itself. When he became a resident of America, on the frontier of Pennsylvania, he felt himself obliged by the very highest and holiest obligations of citizenship to imperil his life in many Indian wars in order to preserve the lives and protect the homes of the people among whom he lived. When the tocsin of war sounded, and the Colonies "struck for liberty" and for freedom from the intolerable and tyrannical aggressions of Great Britain, being impressed with the right and righteousness of the cause of the Colonies, he at once offered his services in their behalf, gave up his life for the cause which he espoused, and died that liberty might live.

His life was a strenuous one, full of exacting and unselfish work for others: As a country doctor, ministering to the sick and comforting the suffering; as a Mason, teaching by precept and by example the cardinal doctrines of the craft, the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; as a member of the church, expressing by his walk and conversation the faith he felt in the Savior of men, whom he humbly followed; as the head of his home, in the God-given capacity of husband and father, ever directing its affairs and executing its duties, making his home life spotless and stainless; as a citizen, evading no obligation and avoiding no demand imposed upon that citizenship. He was a soldier always, vigilant, obedient and loyal; an officer whose tactics were of the onward, never backward order, counselling against evacuation of strategic positions, even though it seemed impossible to retain them, with judgment that could be always relied on, said the great Washington. When confronted by seemingly insurmountable obstacles, he suggested movements by which superiority in numbers could be overridden by superiority in forethought and decisive action. He was brave without being desperate; he was a good disciplinarian without being a martinet. In his vocabulary there was no such word as "surrender." He was willing "to do, dare or die'' for the flag under which he enlisted; he unsheathed his sword in honor, and never was it dishonored to his dying day; he was the hero of Princeton, with no one to pluck that laurel from his brow, and is entitled to the glory that came from that victory which resulted in a Confederation of States that has made the Western Hemisphere the admiration and the wonder of the world. He is entitled to the gratitude of all liberty-loving America. His life was beautiful and complete in its symmetry, and was both a benediction and benefaction. The memory of such a man cannot perish from the face of the earth, but shall be as eternal as Truth.

CHAPTER VII

THIS narrative would not be complete without a short story of the friends of Hugh Mercer at Fredericksburg—his daily associates, who communed with him at the sessions of the Masonic Lodge; who sat around the old open fireplace at the Rising Sun tavern and talked with him about the gossip of the town; who watched and waited with him, in front of the post-office, for the coming of the rumbling, rattling old stage with its weekly mail and its belated news from Williamsburg. It is not, however, my purpose to write a biography of these people, but only a short sketch of them as their lives touched that of Mercer's, and as these distinguished people were connected and associated with Fredericksburg; and, as Washington stands in the forefront of this nation's life, so he stands, peerless and high above all others, in the life of this town.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

He who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen" was a very small boy when his father, Augustine Washington, died on his place, since called "The Washington Farm," opposite Fredericksburg. He went to school in that town, and in after-life referred to it as the town of his youth and maturing manhood. Just before the commencement of the Revolution, his mother and her family moved into the town. Washington, in his maturer years, visited his mother there frequently. He and his bride, en route from Williamsburg to Mount Vernon, came by Fredericksburg to receive, no doubt, his mother's blessing and benediction. He was the owner of several lots in the town. After the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, Washington, impelled by the love and adoration which he had for her, determined that his first visit should be to his mother at Fredericksburg, and he came to her without delay. On that visit he was received with expressions of joy and gratitude by the people of the place, and was presented with an address of welcome and congratulations by the Town Council. On that occasion a grand ball was given in his honor, which he attended, accompanied by Lafayette and other distinguished officers. In those days the ball commenced at early candle-light. His aged mother, whom he escorted, left at nine o'clock. After seeing her safely home, he returned and danced the stately minuet with one of the Gregory girls, who was his cousin.

Washington was a member of Lodge No. 4, A. F. and A. M., the records of which lodge show that he was made a Mason November, 1752. On that date there was received from George Washington, for his entrance fee, two pounds and five shillings.

When in Fredericksburg he attended the services of St. George's Episcopal Church. It is related that on one of his visits after he had become great and famous, while attending the services of this church, it became overcrowded, that the old frame building gave evidences of being unsafe, and that a panic was only averted by the coolness of Washington himself.

His only sister, Bettie, who married Fielding Lewis, lived at a place called "Kenmore," then on the outskirts of the town.

Parson Weems locates Fredericksburg as the place where the great Washington threw a silver dollar across the Rappahannock River, and the farm just across the river and immediately opposite Fredericksburg as the place where the cherry tree and hatchet incident occurred. Although tradition says Washington read this life of himself by Weems, history does not record what he said about it. Perhaps he thought if he (Washington) could not tell a lie, the parson could, and did.

Mercer and Washington were close and intimate friends from the time they first met on the frontier of Pennsylvania until the death of Mercer at Princeton. They often met in old Fredericksburg, at the home of Washington's mother, in the lodge room, and at the old Rising Sun tavern. He who enters the town is constrained to stand reverently, with uncovered head, on ground around which cling holy memories of its most illustrious citizen.

JOHN PAUL JONES

John Paul was born July 6, 1747, in the parish of Kirkbean, Scotland. His brother, William Paul, had resided in Fredericksburg some time prior to 1760, and kept a grocery store in a house now standing at the corner of Prussia and Main streets.

The will of William Paul is recorded in Spottsylvania County, dated March 22, 1772, and probated November 16, 1774. In his will he wrote: "It is my will and desire that my lots and houses in this town be sold and converted into money, which I give and bequeath to my beloved sister, Mary Young, and her two oldest children, in the Parish of Kirkbean, in the stewarty of Galloway, North Britain, Scotland." And as this Mary Young was also sister of John Paul, it cannot possibly be doubted that William and John Paul were brothers. William Paul died in 1773, and is buried in old St. George's churchyard. Over his remains there is still standing a moss-covered stone, with the simple inscription: "William Paul, 1773."

Seven cities claimed Homer, dead, and three contended for Virgil; a greater number of American cities claim that John Paul had his home within their gates, but the record is against them. Fredericksburg, Virginia, was the one and only home of the great admiral in this country. One of his many biographers, as far back as 1823, locates him at Fredericksburg, at the home of his brother William.

During the Revolution he wrote to Baron Von Copelan: "America has been the country of my fond election since I was thirteen, when I first saw it." His first visit, therefore, to Fredericksburg was about 1760, and after remaining there for nearly four years he went back to Scotland. In "The National Portrait Gallery," published in 1833, it is stated, "In 1773 we find him (John Paul) in Fredericksburg, arranging the estate of his brother William, who had settled in Fredericksburg." In addition, the traditions and history of the town establish the unimpeachable fact that the illustrious hero of the sea had only one home in America—Fredericksburg. It was while living there that he added Jones to his name. The reason that moved him to do this is not known. Speculation and guesses abound, and authorities differ. There must have been some strong impelling cause, but it is locked in the mystery of a long silence.

While a resident of that town he received his commission as lieutenant in the Continental Navy. The splendid achievements of John Paul Jones are already so well known to the world that I will not attempt in so brief an article as this to narrate them or to give the story of his brilliant career.

His hand was the first to unfurl the Stars and Stripes on the high seas. As the commander of the Bon Homme Richard, his story is the pride of every boy in America. He was the only man who ever gave battle to the English on English soil. These things are within the knowledge of all. It is of his life in Fredericksburg that I write, and strive to redeem from the past those years of which so little has been written.

Mercer and Jones, both Scotchmen, were residents there at the same time, and it can scarcely be drawing on the imagination to picture these men of the Clans of old Scotland often meeting in social intercourse to talk of the land of their birth, being drawn together as friends and associates by the strong bond of their mother-country.

It was from Fredericksburg that Mercer went forth to make his name immortal, fighting the battles of the Colonies on land; and it was from there that John Paul Jones went to become illustrious by his great victories on the sea. The memories of both these great and illustrious men are cherished by old Fredericksburg, and will ever be cherished by her as long as the story of their lives shall live and Fredericksburg shall last.

GENERAL GEORGE WEEDON

George Weedon was the "mine host" of the Rising Sun tavern at Fredericksburg, whom our English traveler, heretofore mentioned, said was over-zealous in stirring up sedition in the Colonies. He was also postmaster there. The post-office was kept in the tavern. Weedon was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of which Mercer was the colonel, was promoted to its colonelcy on August 17, 1776, and was made a brigadier-general on February 24, 1777.

In the Battle of Brandywine, Weedon rendered conspicuous and valuable service while commanding a brigade in Greene's division, which checked the pursuit of the British and saved our army from utter and complete rout. He was a brave and brilliant commanding officer at the Battle of Germantown. In consequence of some dissatisfaction about rank, he left the army at Valley Forge, re-entering it in 1780; and in 1781 he was given the command of the Virginia Militia at Gloucester, which position he held at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

General Weedon was the first president of the Virginia Branch of the Society of Cincinnati, and was a member of Lodge No. 4, A. F. and A. M., of which lodge Mercer was at one time the Master. After the death of his brother-in-law, General Hugh Mercer, General Weedon occupied "The Sentry Box" on lower Main street; and was appointed by the Court the guardian of Mercer's children. He died in Fredericksburg in the early part of the last century.

The General wrote a song, entitled "Christmas Day in '76," which was sung at his festive board at each recurring Christmas. A very interesting account of this was given in a letter dated February 8, 1837, from Hugh Mercer, Esq., the son of the General, to the grandfather of Judge Beverly Wellford, of Richmond, and no apology is offered for reproducing this song in this memoir.

CHRISTMAS DAY IN '76

On Christmas Day in seventy-six
 Our ragged troops, with bayonets fixed,
     For Trenton marched away.
 The Delaware ice, the boats below,
 The light obscured by hail and snow,
     But no signs of dismay.

Our object was the Hessian band
That dare invade fair Freedom's land,
At quarter in that place.
Great Washington, he led us on,
With ensigns streaming with renown,
Which ne'er had known disgrace.

In silent march we spent the night,
Each soldier panting for the fight,
Though quite benumbed with frost.
Greene on the left at six began,
The right was with brave Sullivan,
Who in battle no time lost.

Their pickets stormed; the alarm was spread;
The rebels, risen from the dead,
Were marching into town.
Some scampered here, some scampered
there,
And some for action did prepare;
But soon their arms laid down.

Twelve hundred servile miscreants,
With all their colors, guns, and tents,
Were trophies of the day.
The frolic o'er, the bright canteen
In center, front, and rear, was seen,
Driving fatigue away.

And, brothers of the cause, let's sing
 Our safe deliverance from a king
 Who strove to extend his sway.
 And life, you know, is but a span;
 Let's touch the tankard while we can,
 In memory of the day.

“Written by General George Weedon, of the Revolutionary Army, who was in the action at Trenton, and had charge of the Hessian prisoners after the victory, which prevented his being at Princeton a few days after and taking part in that glorious victory.

“My uncle and second father, General Weedon, went through the whole Revolutionary War, commanding the American troops on the Gloucester side of York River during the siege of York and the surrender of the British Army at that memorable place. The brilliant victories at Trenton and Princeton were won at the most gloomy period of the great struggle for our independence; it was the crisis of the war, and turned the scale in favor of our bleeding country.

H. MERCER.”

“My dear Sir: I have had much pleasure in writing out for you, as you requested, the patriotic song of ‘Christmas Day in ’76.’ For many years after the Revolution my uncle celebrated at 'The Sentry Box' (his residence, and now mine) the capture of the Hessians, by a great festival—a jubilee dinner, if I may so express myself—at which the Revolutionary officers then living here and in our vicinity, besides others of our friends, were always present. It was an annual feast, a day or so after Christmas Day, and the same guests always attended.

“Your father was, of course, a standing guest. I was young, and a little fellow, and was always drawn up at the table to sing ‘Christmas Day in ’76.’

“Two young servant boys he was bringing up as waiters in the family were posted at the door as sentinels, in military costumes, with wooden muskets on their shoulders; one he called Corporal Killbuck and the other Corporal Kildee. It was always a joyous holiday at ‘The Sentry Box.’

“I am, my dear sir,

“Most truly yours,

“H. MERCER.”

JAMES MONROE

James Monroe was born in Westmoreland County, Virginia, April 28, 1758. He was educated at William and Mary College, graduating in 1776. On leaving that college he took up law for a profession; but being inspired by the martial fire that was then filling the breasts of the young men of that time, at the commencement of hostilities he offered his services and sword in the cause of the Colonies. He was made a lieutenant in the regiment which was commanded by Hugh Mercer, and was with Washington and Mercer when they crossed the Delaware. On December 26, 1776, he was wounded in the shoulder at Trenton, while leading the van of the army. On recovering from his wound he was appointed as an aide-de-camp on the staff of Lord Sterling, and was in the battles of Brandywine, Germantown and Monmouth.

After the war he again took up his residence in Fredericksburg. Under the laws then in force, in order to vote and hold office it was necessary to own property; and to meet that qualification, an uncle of Monroe, who was also a resident of Fredericksburg, made him a gift of a town lot, and thus he was enabled to exercise the great and inalienable right of an American citizen.

Monroe was at that time a member of the Fredericksburg Town Council, and a vestryman of St. George's Episcopal

“The Sentry Box,” the Home of Mercer, Fredericksburg, Virginia.

Church. When only twenty-four years of age he was sent to Congress for the district of which Fredericksburg constituted a part. So it was brought about that Monroe, in the Town Council of Fredericksburg, commenced a career which culminated in his election to the Presidency.

Monroe was a continuous office-holder, having been a town councilman, a member of the Virginia Legislature, Governor of that State, member of Congress, minister to two foreign courts, senator, cabinet officer and President. And, what is to his everlasting honor and credit, he executed the trusts of these various and varied stations with faithfulness and efficiency. He did his duty, and did it well, and has enshrined his name in America's history as a patriotic citizen, and as a conscientious, conservative and able officer.

The result of his life in dollars and cents was that his poverty was to him a badge of honor.

Monroe was much younger than Mercer, but he doubtless was found on the outskirts of the assembled and much excited patriots around the old open fireplace at the Rising Sun tavern, which tradition locates as a meeting place of these worthies "in ye olden time" for the discussion of the removal of the powder at Williamsburg by Dunmore, and other acts of England's intolerable tyranny, as well as to formulate methods and means to stop and stay the onward march of Great Britain's aggressions against the rights and liberties of the Colonies. And when the cry "To arms!" rang out over the land, young Monroe showed his faith by his works when he enlisted in the regiment of which his friend, Mercer, was colonel.

He was, however, destined to play a greater and more prominent part in the drama of life than Mercer. From a lieutenant he became the Commander-in-Chief of the army; from a member of the council of the town of Fredericksburg he became the Chief Executive of the Republic. Who knows how potential was the influence of Mercer on the life of Monroe, and how much, and how far, that influence shaped and molded his character, and thus brought about the illustrious career of Monroe? We only know that they were true and loyal friends.

MARY, THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON

After the death of her husband, Augustine Washington, "Madam Washington," as she was called by her neighbors and friends, moved to Fredericksburg, and lived and died in the house now standing on the corner of Charles and Lewis streets.

The world pays its tribute to the memory of the mother of the "Father of His Country." President Andrew Jackson said that "the character of Washington was aided and strengthened, if not formed, by the care and precepts of his mother, who was remarkable for the vigor of her intellect and the firmness of her resolution."

Mrs. Washington was left in early life a widow, with the burden of a young and large family, and to the task of guarding and governing them she unselfishly devoted herself. She was a woman of much business ability, for her farm she managed with great skill and with profitable results. Tradition says she was rather inaccessible and somewhat exclusive, for she was in no sense a society woman. Mrs. Washington was intensely religious, a consistent member of St. George's Episcopal Church, and very charitable to the poor. Her hospitable home was always open to her friends, among whom was Hugh Mercer, who was a frequent visitor there.

When Washington found himself the laurel-crowned hero of the new Republic, he came first to pay his homage and filial devotion to his revered mother. On that visit he was accompanied by Lafayette and a number of other distinguished military men. She received him as a devoted mother should receive a dutiful son. In that reception Washington the hero, to her, had no part. She was proud of her great son, proud because of his greatness, but prouder still, no doubt, as she remembered her part in making that son great.

He escorted her to the Peace Ball before mentioned. At nine o'clock she said it was time for old people to go home, and she went.

Washington sent a special messenger to his mother, it is said, to give her the glad tidings of the surrender of Cornwallis. An old gentleman once told the writer of this brief memoir that when that messenger dashed up the deserted streets of Fredericksburg a Mr. Keiger, then a very young but precocious boy, was urged by some older ones standing on the street corner to go up to Madam Washington and get the news. Keiger went; Mrs. Washington was in her garden; he watched and waited until she had opened the letter with a pair of scissors attached to her waist by a cord, then turning, she said, "My young man, what is it you want?" He told her. She said, "Tell the gossips that George has sent me word that Lord Cornwallis has surrendered at Yorktown."

Lafayette, on his visit, called on the mother of his illustrious chief; he wrote home to France quite a lengthy account of that visit. Mrs. Washington met him at the door of her residence; he introduced himself. "Walk right in," said the Madam. "I am glad to see you, for George has told me all about you." He was ushered into the parlor, and refreshed the inner man with her home-made ginger cake and her home-brewed rum punch; and he went from that simple country home declaring that he was glad to say he had seen in her a splendid old Virginia matron.

In appearance, Mrs. Washington was of medium height, and rather stout in her old age, but carried herself with great dignity. For a number of years she suffered from a very painful disease. On August 25, 1789, she died. In her last illness she was attended by Doctors Mortimer and Hall. The funeral ceremonies were held in St. George's Episcopal Church, August 28, 1789. On the day of the funeral all business was suspended in the town; the church bells tolled. The whole population wended its way solemnly and reverently to pay its last sad tribute to the memory of a friend and neighbor. She was buried on the Kenmore farm, then owned and occupied by her daughter, Mrs. Fielding Lewis, in a spot she herself had selected for that purpose, near what are now known as the Oratory Rocks, where she frequently sat with her grandchildren and read her Bible.

When the sad tidings of her death was conveyed to Congress, resolutions of sympathy for President Washington, and a tribute to her memory, were passed. This deeply touched Washington, who responded in a note of thanks, adding: "I attribute all of my success in life to the moral, intellectual and physical education which I received from my mother." No grander tribute was ever paid by a great man to his mother than that, and the world, well knowing how much was accomplished by him, can readily pay its homage to the memory of this great and good woman, for—

“Methinks we see thee as in olden time,
Simple in garb, majestic and serene,
Unmoved by pomp and circumstance,
Inflexible, and with a Spartan zeal
Repressing vice, and making folly grave.”

In 1833 the erection of a monument over the grave of this most illustrious of American women was commenced, but never completed. Congress was importuned, but failed to act, although it had promised in 1789, by solemn resolution, to build a monument to mark the spot where sleeps the mother of Washington.

On October 21, 1889, the following appeal was made by the wife of this writer:

“AN APPEAL IN BEHALF OF THE MARY
WASHINGTON MONUMENT

“Amid great pomp and ceremony the corner-stone of the monument to the memory of Mary Washington, the mother of ‘The Father of this Republic,’ was laid in 1833. The erection of the monument over the grave of this most illustrious of American women was voluntarily undertaken by a philanthropic and patriotic citizen, Silas Burrows, of New York. Mr. Burrows died before its completion. It is now in an unfinished and dilapidated condition.

“Congress has been again and again appealed to and importuned. Favorable legislation has been promised, but this incomplete monument crumbles and decays. Shall the memory of the mother of the great Washington longer be neglected? In every State of this Union monuments mark with emphasis the veneration with which George Washington is held by a grateful republic, and at the Capitol of the nation there is one that towers above all the rest; but nowhere is there recognition made of the mother. Her very grave at this place is marked only by an unsightly pile of marble. Shall this neglect continue?

“Mrs. Washington was an uncommon woman. It is recorded of her that ‘she was of strong will, splendid judgment, untiring energy, and without pretension,’ and from these elements she molded her great son, taught him to become great, equipped him with attributes essential to greatness.

“She lived, during the Revolutionary War, in Fredericksburg; died, and was buried here at the spot she herself had selected for that purpose. Shall the grave of Mary Washington be allowed to remain longer in a condition which is the reminder of the forgetfulness, rather than the gratitude, of our people? Remember that the grave of Washington himself is held as a very Mecca to which all liberty-loving people can make their pilgrimage—the work of the faithful and devoted women of this land. And it is proposed that an organization shall at once be formed, having for its object the erection of a monument over the grave of George Washington's mother at this place.

“Will the women of this Republic respond to this appeal? Are they not willing to undertake this patriotic work?

“To the end that steps may be immediately taken, it is intended to obtain a charter of incorporation of the Mary Washington Memorial Association, to have a president, one vice-president in each State, and other usual and necessary officers, all women. It is also suggested that the ladies of America, on February 22, 1890, shall in every State make some organized effort to raise the necessary funds. The writer of this requests that the papers give circulation to this appeal, and she will be glad to hear from any ladies who desire to take an active interest in this patriotic purpose.

“MRS. JOHN T. GOOLRICK.
“Fredericksburg, Va., Oct. 15, 1889.”

In response, largely to that appeal, or in part at least as a result of it, the National Mary Washington Monument Association was organized, composed of patriotic women of America, and a stately, imposing monument stands sentinel over the grave of Mrs. Washington. On one side of it is inscribed, “Erected by Her Countrywomen.” Just here it will not be irrelevant to record an incident. A verdant woman visited this monument and read “Erected by Her Countrywomen.” “Thank the Lawd!” she said, “that no city wimen had nothing to do with this monument.” On the other side of this splendid granite shaft is inscribed in raised letters this epitaph:

“Mary, the Mother of Washington.”

LODGE NO. 4, A. F. AND A. M.

Past Master Bro. S. J. Quinn, of Fredericksburg, has compiled a very interesting history of this Lodge. From it we find that it was organized September 1, 1752. It has had among its membership many good men and true, many who became illustrious besides George Washington, Hugh Mercer and George Weedon, of whose membership in that Lodge we have heretofore made mention. Its records are quaint and curious, and as an illustration of this, we extract from its proceedings as follows:

The Monument to Mary, the Mother of Washington, Fredericksburg, Virginia

“On December 19, 1755, it was resolved by unanimous consent of the Lodge, that the treasurer shall, at his discretion, purchase on account of this Lodge six lottery tickets, and the numbers of them to be returned to the Lodge and made a minute of.” And tradition says that these tickets were signed by the illustrious brother, George Washington, who was president of the company.

On April 15, 1769, “on motion of Brother Alexander Woodron, it was resolved, that the stewarts of this Lodge, for the time being, shall for the future provide liquors, candies, and all other necessaries for the use of the Lodge.” About this time two demijohns, one called “Jachen,” full of Jamaica rum, and the other called “Boaz,” full of Holland gin, with an old-fashioned loaf of sugar, were kept in the ante-room for the refreshment of the brethren; and tradition hath it, that some of the brothers were content to tarry in the ante-room and never got any farther.

“On December 27, 1756, being the anniversary of our Patron Saint John, the Lodge assembled, attended by several visiting brothers, and went in procession to the church, where we heard a most excellent sermon preached by our worthy Brother James Marye, after which we returned in procession to the Lodge, where our worthy Master returned the thanks of the Lodge to our worthy Brother James Marye for so good a sermon.

“The Lodge being closed, the evening was spent very agreeably with a Ball.”

On the second Sunday in December, 1799, after the death of General Washington, Lodge No. 4 met in a Lodge of sorrow. The Grand Master of Virginia, who was a member of that Lodge and citizen of Fredericksburg, Benjamin Day, made an address, from which we quote in part:

“We are now, brethren, assembled to pay the last sad tribute of affection and respect to the eminent virtues and exemplary conduct that adorned the character of our worthy deceased brother, George Washington. He was early initiated in this venerable Lodge, in the mysteries of our ancient and honorable profession, and having

General George Washington as a Mason and Member of

held it in the highest and most just veneration, the fraternal attention we now show to his memory is the more incumbent upon us."

After these memorial exercises in the Lodge room, the Lodge went in procession to St. George's Episcopal Church, where religious services were held.

On Sunday, November 28, 1824, General Lafayette, with his son, George Washington Lafayette, and Colonel La Vassem, visited that Lodge. Lafayette on this occasion was made an Honorary Member, and in response to an address of welcome the Marquis said:

"The pleasure I ever feel in our fraternal meetings cannot but be enhanced by the consideration, that in this city the first lessons of childhood, and in this Lodge the first lessons of Masonry, were conferred upon the man who was first in all our hearts." * * *

This old Lodge has many valuable relics and mementos of the old times; among them, a portrait of Washington painted from life by Sully, and the Holy Bible upon which Washington, Mercer and Weedon were obligated as Masons.

This historic Lodge, the Alma Mater in Masonry of distinguished and illustrious men, feels proud of its record, as well as of its roll of honor; for it has always been faithful and true to the sacred principles and tenets of the order, ever practicing and proclaiming as its holy mission the elevation and ennoblement of mankind.

APPENDIX

GENEALOGICAL NOTES ON THE DESCENDANTS OF REV. JOHN MERCER OF KINNELLAN 1650-1676.

John Mercer 1 was minister of Kinnellan in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, from 1650 to 1676, when he resigned (in June) because of infirmity. He died August 7, 1677. John Mercer of Kinnellan married Lilius Row. She was the great-granddaughter of John Row, the Reformer. (See The Scottish Nation by William Anderson, Vol. III, p. 380.)

The children of John Mercer (1) and Lilius Row, his wife, were:

1. John Mercer 2. Baptized January 8, 1654, at Old Machar. Died young.

2. Agnes 2 (or Annas). Baptized January 20, 1656. Polled, 1696, at Todlay, Parish of Alva.

104    The Life of General Hugh Mercer

3. Thomas Mercer 2. Baptized January 20, 1658. Polled, 1696. He was married twice. His first wife was Anna Raite. The marriage contract is dated July 13, 1681. His second wife was Isabel.

The children of THOMAS MERCER 2 (5) were:

1. Lilius Mercer 3. Polled 1696.
  2. John Mercer 3. Polled 1696. Married Isabel Martin.
  3. Margaret Mercer 3. Polled 1696.
